

PITTSBURGH SEMINARY SEEKS NEXT PRESIDENT

The next (seventh) President of Pittsburgh Theological Seminary will lead this Christ-centered and ecumenically minded institution to its next level of success through entrepreneurial, transparent, and collaborative leadership.

The President of Pittsburgh Theological Seminary will be either an ordained minister or a practicing and theologically trained member of a Christian denomination that recognizes Seminary graduates as having fulfilled educational ordination requirements. While honoring the Reformed tradition and committed to the Seminary's relationship with the Presbyterian Church (USA), the next President will welcome and genuinely embrace insights from other faith traditions.

It is also expected that the Seminary's next President will be theologically well-grounded with an astute understanding of the challenges facing 21st-century theological education. A terminal degree is preferred, as well as earned distinction as a senior-level administrative leader with a record of progressive responsibility in theological education, higher education, or a faith-based non-profit organization. Above all else, the next President will be a highly relational and spiritually mature. The President will model servant leadership that encourages others to grow toward Christ. The ability to build relationships of trust and to inspire the Seminary community around a unifying vision also will be gifts of the next President.

Personal characteristics of an entrepreneurial spirit with an uncompromising work ethic and the emotional intelligence to engage others with integrity, humility, cultural competence, transparency, and diplomacy are also essential.
